Summary

13. (SBU) A Congressional delegation led by Representative Gregory Meeks met on June 4 with Prosecutor General's Office (Fiscalia) head Mario Iguaran and senior Fiscalia officials to determine the resources needed to improve the Fiscalia's capacity to pursue high-profile human rights cases and to protect witnesses. Iguaran acknowledged the generous help already provided by the U.S. and welcomed any additional resources that would allow the Fiscalia to do more. Iguaran told the Codel he was lobbying the Colombian Congress to pass the National Development Plan which includes a provision that would increase the Fiscalia's resources and personnel. End Summary

Iguaran's Report Card

14. (SBU) Prosecutor General Iguaran said the Fiscalia was committed to report openly on Colombia's justice system. He understood the international community's interest in seeing progress on human rights and labor-related cases, especially given the US-Colombia Trade Promotion Act pending in the U.S. Congress. Iguaran said the Fiscalía has created a special unit to investigate labor-related violence and seek convictions in cases of violence against union members. Iguaran noted that in the past two years, the Colombian justice system has made significant advances in the implementation of the new accusatory system. He said the Fiscalía has also taken a more aggressive approach in prosecuting human rights cases, citing Jamundi and the ongoing investigation of civilian disappearances attributed to the military following the M-19 terrorist group's seizure of the Supreme Court in 1985.

Greater Resources Needed

15. (SBU) Representative Meeks acknowledged Iguaran's excellent reputation in Colombia and the United States, and offered to help the Fiscalía with additional resources to pursue sensitive cases and improve its Witness Protection Program. Iguaran thanked the Codel for the USG's generous assistance, and welcomed new resources to strengthen the Human Rights Unit, Justice and Peace Law Unit, Witness Protection Program, and the search for mass graves. He said the high cost of implementing the accusatorial system and applying the Justice and Peace Law have boosted both the workload and profile of the Fiscalía. Iguaran said he was lobbying the Colombian Congress to approve a provision in the National Development Plan that would increase the Fiscalía's resources and personnel.

Labor Cases of Great Concern

16. (SBU) Representative Sanchez said she was concerned about weak labor rights, and asked Iguaran what was being done to improve the environment for unions. Iguaran said the Ministry of Social Protection was primarily responsible for monitoring labor rights. He added that the Fiscalía had created a labor sub-unit with 13 prosecutors and 78 investigators to investigate violence against unionists. Working with labor organizations, the new Unit identified 200 priority cases to investigate and prosecute. Iguaran said more needs to be done, but cited the new labor Unit as a large step forward.
